

Breaking news, a huge octopus-like creature is moving over the western Pacific Ocean. The unknown gas it emits will be affected by the airflow and drift into coastal areas.

According to expert analysis, these gases may contain trace amounts of toxicity. They are colorless and odorless, so they are difficult to perceive by the human body.

The defense department is considering using sonic weapons to drive it away from the earth. Still, it will take some time before the equipment can be placed in place.

A spokesperson for the health department called on residents along the coast to minimize going out. If you need to go out, please wear a mask to avoid inhaling toxic gases.

Lisa, why is everyone wearing masks, is covid-19 back?

I don't know, Michael.
